CALLING ALL PETER JACKSONS

OHAKUNE -- Organisers of the inaugural BIG MOUNTAIN SHORT FILM FESTIVAL have announced they are actively seeking short film entries from New Zealanders.

"If you've got a video camera and a computer, you should submit a film," said Jeff Bollow, the festival's director and co-founder. "A good story can be made with nothing but a little creativity."

Held in Ohakune on Labour Weekend, October 20 - 22, the festival offers free admission, free low-budget filmmaking seminars, a schools competition, and up to 80 short films made by local and international filmmakers, presented under two strands: "Budget" and "No-Budget".

Program A will screen up to 30 short films produced for over $1,000 or which would otherwise be considered professional. Program B, the "No Budget" category, will show up to 50 short films made for less than $1,000 using only a home video camera and a computer.

"Big Mountain is a new annual event aimed at educating, inspiring and celebrating the next generation of talent," said Bollow, a Los Angeles native and producer/director of Making Fantastic Short Films, an educational DVD for schools. "We want to nurture that talent, and help build a thriving industry well into the future."

Filmmakers and would-be's can submit as many films as they like on DVD, at no cost, and some of the prizes include a trip for two to Sydney, internships at production companies, and participation in an upcoming production.

But get started immediately -- the submission deadline is August 30th, and full submission details can be found on the festival's website at www.bigmountain.co.nz
